Privacy commissioner John Edwards described the Government plans to capture the individual and personal data of vulnerable clients as "excessive and unnecessary", and it could have serious and unintended consequences.

Social Development Minister Anne Tolley has lambasted her officials and referred a near major privacy breach to her chief executive as an "employment matter".

She would not be drawn on whether she thought anyone should lose their job, after it emerged an IT system designed to hold highly sensitive, personal information, allowed organisations to access the client data of other
